

Dear Sirs

I think the BBC has lost its impartiality and is setting dual standards in its programme making. It would never entertain making a programme which offended Muslim sensitivities (nor should it do so) and depicted their religious leaders as scheming, perverse and incompetent as well as not practicing the dictates of their faith. The BBC, nevertheless continues its propaganda against the Roman Catholic Church with a programme "Popetown" which is offensive to many Roman Catholics.

I might also add that complaints based upon ethical or religious objections are sidetracked with the excuse that the objection is not based upon specific programme content, even though it may be one based upon their own publicity. It is, however, the very nature and content of this programme (Popetown) which causes the ethical and religious objection.

When will the BBC treat Christian sensitivities, and particularly Roman Catholic ones, with the same sensibility and respect shown to other parts of the Community?

Perhaps in future we will, God forbid, be able to "look forward" to cynical programmes about the Agotellaks - but I doubt it.

Please respond

Yours faithfully

Edwin Bonney

E. V. BONNEY Esq.