

Mr. D. Burgess

19/03/04

The BBC must remain a public service broadcasting institution.
It should continue to be funded by the public.
It must not be privatised or become subject to private finance initiatives.

Murdoch must not be allowed to get his hands on the BBC.

The BBC has an excellent news service which must be preserved. It also has essential educational services.

The BBC must keep up to date with all advances in technology.
The introduction of terrestrial digital television has been full of problem with very unsatisfactory reception in many areas.

The BBC should continue to produce magazines like the Radio Times.
It should also sell DVDs and videos of its programmes and sell its programmes world wide.

The present system of regulation by governors should continue.

The BBC must not accept advertising. Commercial television programming tends to be dictated by the demands of advertisers.

David Burgess