

From: Sheila Caygill
Sent: 17 December 2003 11:25
To: BBC Charter Review

Dear Sirs,

Judging the BBC by today standard of programmes I believe that I am not getting value for money. It is about time that the TV licence be abolished and the BBC seek to finance itself. It should start showing paying commercials and work for the money that they earn. At the moment the people are paying and not getting their money's worth. They are going digital both on TV and radio. What will happen to those people who do have, or cannot afford digital tvs and radios. I do not think the BBC consider the ordinary people who pay their wages and for their programmes. They had had it too cushy and do not have to justify their actions properly to the public.

Sheila Caygill