Dear Miss/MRS VICKERS,

Last week I sent you a letter with questions about the BBC I wanted answers to, and what did you send back but a letter so bloody bland and empty of any answers I wanted it was just a cross between total ignorance and pure stonewalling, like you don't know what I yam on about, as popeye might say. Is it too much trouble for you to answer my questions? According to you it's our BBC and it's your say, yet we still can't get a proper bloody question answered, why? Instead of having a lousy patronising ad in the paper like it's your BBC (which it aint) and it's your say (which you've proved you don't bloody listen to). Why don't you be more honest and straight forward by writing the ad thus:— It's your cash that funds the biased BBC — write to us and ^{ASK} us why we promote Muslims and none-english speaking people, why we are anti-british-anti American, why we stick 2 fingers up at people who question the way the BBC is run, especially people who pay the BBC licence money just because we stick on so many goddamned repeats, (saves us money, we hate spending, must look after the fat-arred executives who've never done an honest days work)

I don't know why I bother asking you questions about the BBC because none of them will be answered, yet you have the nerve to say ~~say~~ its your BBC and its your say, you didn't answer one single question I put to you in my first letter. Heres ^{some} simple questions I'd like answered. Approximately how much annually does the BBC receive in licence money and how much does the BBC save when it continually shows repeats that are in danger of obliteration through over-use, and who is the face-less moron who continually keeps putting them on? Also how much does it cost to send that "whispering Weirdo" Dan Craig Shank around the world, the same question to David "serengeti wilderbeeste" Attenborough, and Judith "old leatherface" Chalmers. If I don't get any answers I'll know you've slung this letter in the waste bin, not that I give a toss as you haven't been very forthcoming.
