

Reply
5/5

21st May, 2005.

BBC Charter Review
Dept for Culture, Media & Sport.

Dear Sirs,

I was quite disappointed in the BBC television coverage of the recent General Election; in that, on the morning after the election, when most results had come in, there was no commentary or round-up, but only children's programmes, and such like things.

I had expected to catch up on the results in this way, having gone to bed early on election night.

I still do not know which results were considered key results, or for what reasons.

Lastly, I feel that the most important issue in England at the moment was totally ignored by all the parties! This was the situation regarding the remaining North Sea and World Sea oil supplies! These are known wasting assets, in that the more life there that are used, the less there is remains to be used. These assets, and the products, as well as their by-products are, at the present, propping up the British economy; in fact, ^{to some} we export less oil and oil products, and sell crude oil and pet products to neighbours, or near-by nations, at less than OPEC prices.

In time, this must come to an end! And that time is no longer far off!

Four years, perhaps? But certainly not much longer than that.

Yours faithfully,
Q. Wadman

Full name Quentin Vincent Wadman.