As a teacher I think it is wonderful that the BBC are creating digital resources to support teachers and learners. However, I am also a television license payer and am concerned that the BBC is making enough money out of license fees to pay for their TV service and fund all these digital projects.

I'm also concerned that the BBC have an unfair advantage over other education services that are struggling in the very competitive multimedia/digital market.

If this funding is proof of the BBC's profit margins then surely something needs to be done to bring down the price of a TV license and ensure there is no BBC monopoly of the digital educational resources.

Kind Regards
Christine Roche
