

SN xi

From: steve [redacted]
Sent: 23 September 2011 21:49
To: Solicitor LevesonInquiry
Subject: from BBC Website 6 august 2011 'whistleblower went unheard'

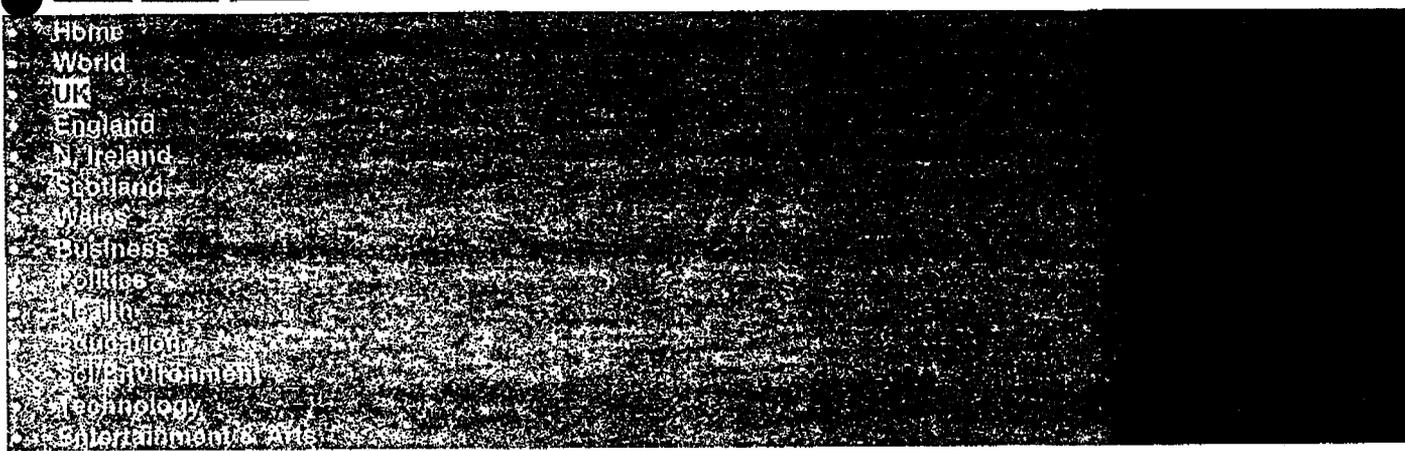

Categories: Red Category

BBC
Accessibility links

BBC NEWS

6 August 2011 Last updated at 15:37

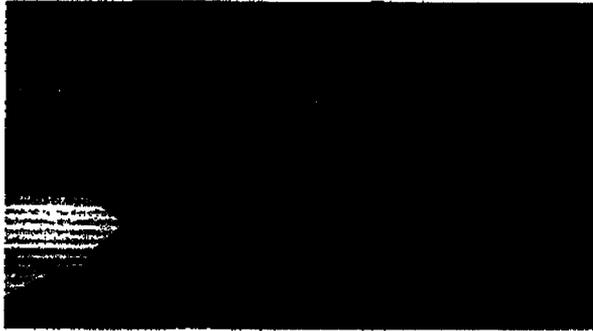

Share this page

- Email
- Print
- Link
- Facebook
- Twitter

Phone-hacking whistleblower Steven Nott unheard

By Matt Prodger Home affairs correspondent

13/03/2000 15:00:00

Mr Nott said he was "gobsmacked" that anyone could access his voicemail messages

Continue reading the main story

Phone-hacking scandal

- Hacking scandal: Who's linked to who?
- Q&A: Phone-hacking scandal
- Key people and profiles
- Timeline

Twelve years ago, Welsh salesman Steven Nott pulled over at a motorway services in something of a panic.

He had been without a mobile phone signal for hours because the network was down, and he could not access the voicemail messages that were essential for him to do his job.

So he rang his supplier, Vodafone, on a landline at the services, and was astonished to be told he could access all his voicemails simply by tapping in a default pin number. And so, for that matter, could anyone else.

He says he was "gobsmacked", and shortly after the incident, in 1999, complained not only to Vodafone but took his story to his local newspaper, and to the police.

The South Wales Argus ran the story under the headline "Sales boss reveals security problem".

'So stupid'

In words eerily prescient of the phone-hacking scandal, which was to erupt years later, he told the paper: "Vodafone has millions of users, and many of them will be MPs and high-ranking government officials, people with highly sensitive information at their fingertips.

"Unauthorised accessing of someone's message service is on a par with tampering with their mail."

But Vodafone was slow to act. The company did not address the issue for some years. In the meantime, Mr Nott was, by his own admission, becoming obsessed by what he had discovered.

He telephoned the Daily Mirror, hoping to give them a scoop that they would splash across their pages, alerting other phone users to the vulnerability of their mobiles to hacking.

He says that over a period of several days he spoke to somebody on the paper's newsdesk, who was excited by the story.

Mr Nott claims the Mirror said they were planning to run a piece about how celebrities' phones could be hacked.

Continue reading the main story

'I'm appalled because I really do seriously think I may have inadvertently started days'

Steven Nott

He says they told him they had "everybody on to it" as they had a massive bank of phone numbers and were ringing everyone to see how they would react to news their mobiles could be tampered with.

But the Mirror never published the story. Mr Nott says the newspaper did, however, pay him £100.

The owner of the Mirror, Trinity Mirror, said on Saturday: "We are not going to dignify this with a comment."

Next, Mr Nott took his story to the offices of the Sun in Wapping, where he met Paul Crosbie, who was then the newspaper's consumer affairs correspondent.

Mr Crosbie now works in PR, but he confirmed to the BBC Mr Nott's account of his visit.

"I did meet Steven, was surprised by what he'd discovered. I'd never heard of it before he came to the office," he said.

"I wrote up what I thought was a very good story, but it never ran. There was only room for a certain number of stories in the Sun, so a lot did get spiked for whatever reason."

Campaign backfires

By this time Mr Nott said he was regretting his actions.

"It didn't take me long to realise what I had done. I couldn't believe I was so stupid to tell a national newspaper how to get hot news for free just by hacking into someone's phone," he said.

"I was on a campaign to raise public awareness and it was backfiring."

Mr Crosbie said: "I don't know whether the information he gave me led to today's events. I only know that I wasn't asked to demonstrate the flaws to anyone."

News International, the publisher of the Sun, declined to comment.

Steven Nott does not claim to be the first person to discover how easy it was to hack a person's mobile phone.

But he does believe he was the first to try to bring it to the attention of the wider public by telling journalists about it. He says he did not anticipate that journalists would use the technique themselves.

"I'm appalled because I really do seriously think I may have inadvertently started this in the early days," he said.

Last month detectives from Operation Weeting, who are investigating the phone-hacking scandal at the News of the World, travelled to Wales to interview Mr Nott.

More on This Story

Phone-hacking scandal

Background

scandal: Who's linked to who?

e-hacking scandal, which has revealed a web of relationships between senior figures in the worlds of politics,

- Murdoch's media empire
- How PM has defended Coulson
- Committee hearings: Key quotes

Demise of the News of the World

id

- NoW offers 'enhanced' redundancy
- Insider's account

News and analysis

d
g'

- Australia confirms media inquiry
- MPs recall James Murdoch
- No Coulson pay probe - watchdog

Video and Audio

PM's phone-hacking statement in full
Skinner confronts PM on BSkyB

- Key moments as MPs grill Murdochs
- Brooks on Milly hacking claims

Blogs

- Robert Peston
- Rory Cellan-Jones

Share this page

241

- Share
- Facebook