

80 ways to say “Welcome to Central European Workers” - courtesy of the “Daily Mail”

In the last 2 years Poles and other Central European workers in the UK and their families have experienced a relentless campaign from the “Daily Mail” that has contrasted with the thoughtful and responsible coverage received from most of the media as well as from British politicians, employers and trade unions.

Of course we accept that there are some aspects of the recent Polish influx into the UK which deserve criticism, even censure, and newspapers have a right to publish such information and such comments. Critical, and even downright irresponsible, articles have appeared in other newspapers but they have normally been tempered by other articles showing Poles in a more positive light. The articles in the “Mail” have not always been untrue but they have an ability to convey a negative political slant in discussing, for instance, the latest government statistics, or a report on migrants by a charity foundation, which contrasts with a more positive interpretation, and in particular a more positive headline, in alternative newspapers. For instance, when on July 17th 2007 the “Daily Mail” headline screams “Influx of Immigrants costs Every UK Household £350 a Year”, the equivalent article in The Independent, based on the same government report, is headed “Home Office: Migrants Work Harder, Earn More and Pay More Taxes than Britons”.

Despite protestations by Robin Esser, Executive Managing Editor of Associated Newspapers Ltd, the owners of the “Daily Mail”, in his letter of January 2nd 2008, headlines and lead paragraphs contain emotional phrases likely to evoke a resentful response from a reader and the “Mail” has managed consistently to eke out the negative story where possible. We even have an example earlier this month where a “Daily Mail” feature writer was offering £100 “for anonymous horror stories of people who have employed Eastern European staff, only for them to steal from them, disappear, or have lied about their resident status.”

In a quarter of the articles there is a quoted comment from the Chairman of Migration Watch UK and often from one of three MPs who regularly allow themselves to be quoted with a negative reference to EU and immigrant workers. Just as often there are derogatory comments about the current government and about the EU which suggests that there is a political agenda in these attacks, perhaps not directly connected to the behaviour of the EU migrants themselves. Poles and other Central Europeans seem to be the whipping boys for the newspaper’s vehement hostility to Britain’s participation in the European Union, immigration and policies of the Labour Government. So much so is this last true that the “Mail” can even use the remarks of a Polish school-boy, and on another occasion a teacher, as a criticism of the Government’s education record and for that end it is prepared to forego its usual negative image of Polish immigrants.

Mr Esser has stated categorically the “Daily Mail is not in any way anti-Polish.” But in answer to concerns that “Daily Mail” stories could be increasing tension in the community he agrees “that it is worrying that there is a section of our society who are reacting badly, sometimes violently, against immigrants. This is not,” he continues, “the result of coverage by the Mail” and then he lays the blame specifically on the present Government’s immigration and social policies. Nevertheless there has been growing concern in the UK, especially among the police, about “hate crimes” against Central Europeans, particularly in the smaller towns throughout the United Kingdom. The nature of these attacks was summarized by me in my report on “Hate Crimes against Poles in UK in 2007” published in January 2008.

This kind of shock reporting, week in week out, serves only to exacerbate the tension. Often the headlines themselves seem more inflammatory than the facts that follow and appear to be based on the supposition that many readers will have merely read the headline itself and then drawn their own conclusion without reading the text below. The Federation has on occasion been allowed to publish a short comment in the Letter’s column but our request in December that the “Mail” may want to quote the Chairman of the Federation of Poles in GB as a commentator in the offending article itself, has not yet taken place, even though the Editor agreed that he would be encourage the News Desk to contact the Federation when writing a story.

Even where Poles or central Europeans are not part of the headline they form a key part of the story that follows thus suggesting that all these sensationalized stories are mainly focused on Polish workers. Of these 80 stories barely 5 could be described as positive in content and in tone. The remainder are designed to ensure that the average “Daily Mail” reader’s heart skips a beat each time with either indignation or alarm. It also means that every Polish reader shudders with anger and apprehension at the negative emphasis of the story.

If the subject had been Pakistani or African immigrants such a string of article headlines would have been considered blatantly racist and probably subject to a court summons.

Here is a list of 80 headlines that have appeared in the “Daily Mail” between May 2006 and February 2008.

Curiously, even when Poles are supposedly leaving, a matter that many would have thought the “Daily Mail” approved, the editors still managed to make it sound pejorative by using the word “desertion”. These article headlines are intended to make their readers’ blood boil. I do not know if they succeed each time in that aim, but they certainly make every Pole’s blood boil. They are slingshots aimed at Europe and the Government which rebound against Poles and other Central Europeans in street abuse, fire-bombed homes and mob attacks, while the “Daily Mail” washes its hands of all responsibility.
